As seen in the above, fake reviews is clearly illegal and unethical practice. He re we analyse how the US and European public authorities, both administrative and judicial, are dealing with this form of unlawful practices.

Enforcement in the United States

A few existing decisions regarding fake reviews allow four conclusions to be dra wn. First, the comparison between the number of sanctions imposed in the US and Europe shows that US authorities are much more active in the fight against fake reviews. Among others, a probable reason for this difference is the longer tradi tion and more resources of the FTC, in comparison to the European agencies. In f act, the FTC employs more than 1100 persons, for 600 of the British CMA and 285 of the Italian AGCM; FTC's budget quadruples that of the British and Italian organisations.<sup>85</sup> In this sense, Spain represents a separate case since its lega l system entrusts the protection of consumers to seventeen regional authorities.

Whilst this fragmentation might be useful in protecting consumers against illeg al local businesses' practices, the fragmentation is highly inefficient when it comes to protecting them from abuse by large corporations. Perhaps the estab lishment of a European agency dedicated to the protection of consumers at the Eu ropean level could alleviate the shortage by pooling resources, necessary to fac e complex and supranational challenges, such as the publication of fake reviews online.

In order to fight fake reviews effectively, a joint commitment of public authori ties and Internet platforms is required. Due to the magnitude and complexity of the issue, it seems that leaving the fight against fake reviews in the hands of
