App Store iPhone 13 Pro

Apple often holds the App Store up as one of the biggest reasons that people should buy iPhones and iPads. You can trust the developers that make the apps that are in it, we're told. And we can trust the apps themselves because other people leave reviews, Apple says.

A recent study by Which? looked into more than 18,000 known-fake reviews that were available in the app stores. Not just the App Store, but the Google Play Store as well. Google's offering was even worse than Apple's. but the fact remains - we can't always trust app reviews.

Are there too many reviews? Fake reviews often hit an app in a large batch, usually in a short space of time. Unless the app goes viral, real reviews come in dribs and drabs, not all within a 24 or 48-hour period, for example.

What's the spelling like? Repeated misspelling of the same word is a good giveaway as well. Fake review sellers try to make their wares look genuine by filling them with fake typos. But too many, especially alongside multiple reviews in a short space of time, can be a dead giveaway that something isn't right.
