You can then use your running total to determine if there is a better or worse chance than normal of a 10-A card being dealt to you in the next hand.

It's important to remember this though: when the dealer shuffles the cards and fills the shoe, you need to start your card counting all over again.

So, how do you go about getting the correct value? Well, it's actually quite simple: you divide the total count by the remaining number of decks.

This means that there's never the chance to get a running count going, meaning that card counting is impossible.
